Tips and Tricks

Conferences: from local to global

Conferences are mediums that gathers our membership and through which they can upscale their organisational knowledge and skills. As an result, these internal events are a platform in which companies showcase their unique mission and culture, thus brand positioning as a top place employer.

Value Proposition and Benefits

- better brand positioning in front of a large pool of young people
- engage with a niche target that fits the profiles the company seeks for
- increase brand awareness on the AIESEC social media channels
- reach one of the biggest alumni community

AIESEC Talent as an added value

the departments they were part of Interacted with various environments
besides faculty
Proactive, entrepreneurial and adaptable

Make analysis based on your demographics

Make an analysis based the needs of the companies as well as your membership. When it comes to what companies are looking for, gather data such as age, academical background, linguistic ski information when it comes to what type of content they expect from the partners as well as elements of organisational culture they are interested in. This will help in VD later. IIs, experience etc. This is relevant information for the back office of the company to measure ROI. On the other side, take as much

Check for the skills that company seek for

Search for the set of hard/soft skills that employers are looking for in candidates annually. Then make an analysis comparing those skills with the ones that our membership are developing through their JDs.

Showcase the alumni's successful stories

AIESEC has one of the biggest alumni community when it comes to NGOs and other similar organisations. Most of them managed either to develop their one business or reached a higher role in the workfield. Gather these stories and expose them to the partners to understand the relevancy of our membership.

Create a nurturing plan

While the ROI from this kind of partnership may not be so visible in the very beginning, it is important to understand how to nurture the partnership so that the company can “grow” next to the AIESECers. Explain to the companies that the outcome can be greater if they are consecvent in attending more conferences so the members get used to their organisational culture.
